

S02.3

Managing the high risk atopic child

Mich LaJeunesse

Southampton Children's Hospital, University of Southampton, UK

Corresponding author: Dr Dermot Ryan, University of Edinburgh, Allergy and Respiratory Research Group, Edinburgh, UK. E-mail: dermotryan@doctors.org.uk

Background: The prevalence of allergy is on the increase globally. There is an urgent need to take a structured approach to the prevention and management of allergy, much of which could be undertaken within primary care.

Educational aims: To understand better the various factors which appear to increase the risk of developing allergy and strategies which are being deployed to reduce these impacts on the individual patient including primary prevention.